HOW YOU CAN HELP WHILE YOUR LOVED ONE IS IN TREATMENT

ENTERING TREATMENT CAN BE A TIME OF GREAT OPPORTUNITY AS WELL AS AN OCCASION FOR ANXIETY. People with addictions may fluctuate in their commitment toward recovery. Many people enter treatment with a secret wish that they will learn how to drink or use drugs without experiencing severe consequences. Such individuals have not come to terms with the fact that they have a potentially life-threatening situation. Clients will usually go through a “grieving process” over the loss of their relationship with intoxication or addictive substances. Family members and loved ones should understand that such grieving—accompanied by bargaining and a roller coaster of emotions—is a normal part of the healing process. There will be times when clients in treatment will want to leave and there will be other moments when they experience incredible hope for the future. Families need to keep in mind that when their loved one acts on a desire to end treatment it may well prove counterproductive—especially if what they are thinking or feelings is a natural part of early recovery.

HELPFUL SUPPORT

- Understanding your loved one's fluctuations in their commitment to recovery.
- Listen and be supportive without judging.
- Do not make hasty decisions. Stay calm and give the treatment process time.
- Do not assume that because your loved one is not happy in treatment that they are having problems with the style of therapy. This may be part of a natural process of finally accepting the addiction.
- Do not feel like you have to rescue a loved one from their own upset feelings during treatment.
- Give your loved one time and space to come to terms with their own recovery program.
- Do not try to make a your loved one feel guilty for being in a recovery program even if they are unable to help out with responsibilities at home.
- Ask our Family & Couples Facilitator if you have any questions about your loved one's recovery program.
- Learn about ways to start your own healing process.

UNHELPFUL SUPPORT

- Agreeing with and supporting your upset loved one without understanding the full situation. Remember that you may be hearing only the part of a story that he wants you to know to justify his leaving treatment.
- Minimizing the addiction problem and accepting that your loved one will get help at home if they want to.
- Distracting a loved one from their recovery process by asking them for constant attention and assurance of being loved.
- Demanding answers to past unresolved issues without using the help of a mediator or counsellor.
- Telling your loved one that you feel jealous about the time they get to focus on recovery. Remember that your loved one is working to become a better person. Treatment is an investment for the future.
- Assuming that your loved one is trying to be someone else or is under some “cultish” influence. Clients will likely learn new words and ways of communicating while at SCHC. Seek to understand the new language instead of feeling concerned by such changes.
